The holiday season, painted with joy, family bonding, and festive activities, can paradoxically become a hotbed of stress. While the sparkle of the holidays remains alive in our hearts, the responsibility of managing preparations, finances, and familial expectations can turn the season into a pressure cooker. Likely most of us have experienced what I refer to as the Baskin Robbin ice cream maker stress where you searched every toy store in town and surrounding areas for the one gift your 4-year-old had to have on Christmas morning. For Arnold and Sinbad, it was Turbo Man. The internet of things has certainly reduced some of that stress, but the struggle was real. But why does a season, once eagerly anticipated in childhood, morph into a stressful juggernaut in adulthood?

Research from the American Psychological Association (APA) reveals that a significant number of Americans experience increased stress during the holidays. A myriad of factors, from financial constraints to societal expectations, contribute to this uptick in stress.

According to the APA, major stressors include:

- Lack of time
- Lack of money
- Commercial pressures
- Gifting expectations
- Dietary temptations
