In workers' compensation, catastrophic claims often require a significant number and various types of ancillary services, anything from a rehabilitation facility, DME, transportation, home health services and more. An ancillary service provider can assist with a catastrophic injury response that coordinates the right ancillary services at the right time for these cases. There are various ways the ancillary service provider â€“ working with the claims adjuster and a specially-trained catastrophic case manager â€“ can help ensure the best-possible service, results and costs, as well as a seamless continuum of care on catastrophic cases. But before we break down how that process works, letâ€™s review what constitutes a catastrophic claim.
