For Consultants: Ten Ways We Help Your Clients Catch Risk Before Costs Escalate

For your clients, the difference between a manageable claim and a costly one can come down to how quickly they recognize that something is changing.

That's why Enlyte is laser focused on connecting data across the claim and turning it into timely, actionable insight, to help your clients identify emerging risk earlier and intervene before problems become more complex and expensive.

Here are 10 ways Enlyte helps your clients stay ahead of risk.

1. Flagging potential risk from the start

Enlyte's proprietary predictive models evaluate claim data beginning at first notice to identify cases that may warrant closer attention or early case management. That gives your clients an opportunity to act sooner on claims showing signs of greater complexity.

2. Watching for risk as the claim changes

A claim that looks routine at first may not stay that way. Enlyte helps identify meaningful mid-claim signals, such as a move from medical-only to lost time, surgery, opioid use or other developments, that may indicate a claim is beginning to move off track.

3. Finding warning signs in medical bill data

Medical bills provide an ongoing view into treatment, utilization and cost. Enlyte analyzes that information to surface emerging issues at the individual claim level while also revealing broader patterns that help your clients understand where risk is developing across their book of business.

4. Using pharmacy activity as an early signal

Changes in medication type, dosage, duration or prescriber activity can point to increasing pain, fragmented care, treatment complications or safety concerns. Enlyte uses these changes as timely signals that a claim may deserve additional attention.

5. Connecting the full picture of the claim

Risk can be difficult to recognize when medical, pharmacy, utilization review, case management and other claim information sit in separate places. Enlyte brings those data sources together, giving your clients a more complete view of an injured individual's recovery journey and helping make emerging risk easier to see.

6. Making treatment patterns easier to spot

Important warning signs can disappear inside rows of claim data. Enlyte uses visual treatment timelines and real-time tools to help your clients quickly identify gaps in care, unusual treatment patterns, treatment occurring before a reported injury date and other situations that warrant a closer look.

7. Bringing outliers to the surface

Your clients shouldn't have to search thousands of claims to find the handful that need attention. Real-time dashboards surface claims that stand apart because of age, cost, complexity or other factors, allowing clients' teams to focus their attention where it can have the greatest impact.

8. Finding insight hidden in notes and medical records

Some of the most valuable information about a claim isn't structured data at all. Enlyte uses AI within medical management to help summarize large volumes of medical records and adjuster notes and surface relevant details a claims professional might otherwise miss.

9. Turning complex data into a clearer story

More information only helps when your clients can understand it quickly. Enlyte transforms complex clinical and claim data into intuitive views such as treatment calendars, body maps and clinical findings, helping adjusters and clinicians see what is happening and make more informed decisions.

10. Getting insight to the person who can act on it

Identifying risk is only the first step. Enlyte helps consolidate alerts, elevate the most relevant information and provide guidance within the tools claims professionals already use to turn insight into earlier action.

Help your clients see risk sooner

Enlyte's advantage isn't simply having more data. It's connecting information from across the claim, identifying the signals that matter and putting that insight in front of the people who can do something about it.

For brokers, that means a stronger conversation with clients: Where could risk be developing today, and do you have the visibility to act before it becomes tomorrow's high-cost claim?
